SUPPORT FOR ABORIGINAL-LED FAMILY VIOLENCE PROGRAMS

The Allan Labor Government is making sure Aboriginal Victorians have the resources they need to tackle family violence in a culturally appropriate way.

Minister for Prevention of Family Violence Vicki Ward yesterday announced 44 Aboriginal-led projects will share in $2.2 million to tackle family violence and released the second action plan under the Dhelk Dja: Safe Our Way – Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families 10 Year Agreement (2018-2028).

The community initiatives grants will support culturally appropriate, community-led projects that prevent and respond to family violence in Aboriginal communities.

Dhelk Dja Action Groups are made up of Aboriginal community members and play a pivotal role in community-led responses to family violence.

Projects funded in this year's grants include:

- a prevention program that engages young people at risk of family violence and focuses on cultural connection
- women's groups supporting Aboriginal women in refuges or in prison through yarning circles
- an awareness-raising project to address violence against Aboriginal LGBTIQ+ individuals in community
- a program designed to help heal, empower, and culturally connect elders affected by family violence
- a therapeutic retreat for fathers and carers of young Aboriginal children affected by family violence.

The grants align with the strategic priorities under the world-leading Dhelk Dja agreement between Victorian Aboriginal communities, Aboriginal organisations and the Victorian Government which aims to ensure Aboriginal people, families and communities are stronger, safer and live free from the harm of family violence.

The second action plan under the Dhelk Dja agreement was developed by Aboriginal communities across Victoria and endorsed by the Koori Caucus and Dhelk Dja Partnership Forum.

The action plan focuses on Aboriginal culture and leadership, Aboriginal-led prevention, self-determining Aboriginal family violence support and services, system transformation based on self-determination and Aboriginal-led and informed innovation, data and research in addressing family violence in Aboriginal communities.
